Administering the Bi-Chloride of Gold Treatment to Men Chiefly from the Learned Professions—How the Days Are Passed.

[COPYRIGHT, 1891.]

Not far back from the grim Westches-ter county jail, in the village of White Plains, is a fine old mansion, surrounded by generous grounds and trees a century old. It is a large wooden building, painted white, with wide piazzas and large, fluted doric pillars on three of its sides. It was built by a wealthy family back early in the '40's.

BRINGING HER BROTHER TO THE INSTI

and occupied for nearly two scores of years as a home of comfort and luxury. The old mansion has arrived at a sen sational period in its history. The floors, relaid since hardly a month, echo to many strange footsteps. Four times a day a peculiar scene is enacted in the spacious room that was formerly the parlor of the mansion. Forty well-dressed men, who have come to confess themselves habitual drunkto confess themselves habitual drunkards or victims of the opium habit, pass in line before a physician and receive the bi-chloride of gold hypodermic treatment. The larger number of the men in this line are in the decade between forty and fifty years, and bear the marks of a professional career and an existence passed in large towns. A few are young men whose dress and manners indicate wealthy connections. In the line are lawyers, physicians, editors and at least one clergyman. Some of them are men sent there by their employers from large business their employers from large business concerns in New York. At eight o'clock, at twelve o'clock and at five and seven thirty the line forms in the wide hall of the old mansion. The men have re-moved their hats and coats. Just with-in the parlor is a small table with a box-like cover which opened discloses a bottle filled with a light pink liquid, two hypodermic syringes, two vials containing opium and morphine and an array of two-ounce and four-ounce bottles filled with bourbon whisky. As the doctor comes forward and fills one of the little syringes from the pink liquid, a music box on another table is playenters the room, bares his left arm and in an instant the sharp point of the needle is applied and he receives near his shoulder a deposit the right light. drop of the pink liquid. He hands the physician an empty two-ounce bottle and receives in return a similar bottle filled with bourbon whisky. The next in line, a tall man with well cut iron-gray beard and a face that curiously blends resolution and business energy with an expression with an expression of over-strung nerves, receives the injection, but turns away without asking for the bourbon. He, however, gives to an attendant an eight-ounce bottle, flat on one side and convex on the other on which is written "No. 3," and the name of the man. The attendant brings him a bottle numbered 4. The lines passes rapidly before the young physician, all baring their arms for the pinch of the hypodermic syringe, some receiving a flask of the whisky, a few asking for morphine or opium and getting it, and many exchanging the numbered bottles. The music continues, the line moves on in silence, broken only by an almost whispered question now and then from the little doctor as he feels his patient's pulse and plies his needle.

After the treatment the men leave the house usually in pairs and stroll leisurely back to the village. Most of them have a common destination in a hotel down near the principal business street of the town. The hotel has a flourishing liquor bar, and as the men arrive at the house many of them pass through this room redolent with the odors of the intoxicants. They per-haps stay and chat over the bar with the dispenser of drinks who may be serving a customer. They pause, however, only for a moment, as they are bound for a room just beyond, in one corner of which is a little case of shelves filled with bottles. This tiny cupboard is known among the men and in the village as the "Keeley bar." It is the repository of the numbered eight-ounce bottles and of some of the whisky flasks. All day it is unlocked and the men have free recourse of it.

The institution at White Plains is the New York state branch of the Keeley sanitarium in Dwight. III. It was estab-sanitarium in Dwight, Ill. It was established five months ago by Charles E. Persons, who came on from Dwight and spent five weeks trying to find a village that would have the conditions of Dwight in respect to having no liquor sallows and failing in the least to have a selection of the conditions and failing in the least time. saloons, and failing in that located in the pretty little town in Westchester county. Since the opening of the institute, as it is called, one hundred and twenty-six cases have been treated, and forty-seven persons, including six women, are now undergoing the course women, are now undergoing the course of doctoring.

The patient is ushered into the office of Dr. Van den Burg, the physician in charge, and if the newcomer is in a condition to listen and talk intelligently he is asked concerning both his general health and his inebriety. If the subject is an habitual drunkard, but is afflicted with no organic disease, the afflicted with no organic disease, the hope is held out to him that in three weeks he will be in the condition of a person who has never had any appetite for alcoholic stimulants, and that if he ever drinks intoxicants after that he ever drinks intoxicants after that he will do so from no craving for the liquor, but because he deliberately or carclessly abandons himself to the possibility of reacquiring the appetite. To the periodical drinker, however, not so positive promises are made. He is told that the craving for intoxicants will be cradicated by the double oblevide of eradicated by the double chloride of gold, but that the periodicity may return at its accustomed time. There will be the usual premonitory symptoms, and if not checked a spree will certainly follow. He is informed, however, that he will be provided with a "reserve for emergency" medicine when he leaves the institute, to be taken when he is threatened with a recurrence of his inability to govern his appetite. The newly-arrived patient at the institute is told that he is to be cured without the exertion of any will power on his part. He is to have all the alcoholic liquor he wants to drink. He alcoholic liquor he wants to drink. He is given a four-ounce bottle of good bourbon whisky—or if his taste craves it, some other liquor—and told that the supply will be replenished whenever he applies at the institute. The only restriction is that he shall not drink any other liquor than what is thus obtained. With merchian and account in the shall with merchian and account in the shall of the shall with merchian and account in the shall of the shall with merchian and account in the shall of the shall be shall With morphine and opium victims the same rule is followed in allowing them all of the drug they crave. A printed slip of the rules of the institute is given to every newcomer. It states that no patient is accepted for less than a three weeks' course of treatment. Borrow ing or loaning money between patients is prohibited, as also is the exchanging of the numbered bottles of internal remedies. The use of tobacco in any form for fifteen minutes before and fifteen minutes after office treatment is forbidden, and eigarette smoking and gambling is declared punishable by instant dismissal. Baths are prescribed at least twice a week. Profesitive and helitages a week. fanity and boisterous conduct on the streets or at the hotels of the village are offenses punished by expulsion.

The patient begins his treatment with a hypodermic injection into his left arm tains the bi-chloride of gold. He is then given No. 1 of the internal remedies, which he is told is a strong nerve tonic. It resembles the whisky in its color and consistency, but tastes much like quasia and is said also to contain bi-chloride. The remedies are prepared in Dwight, where the secret of their compound is also preserved. The numbered remedies are in eight-ounce bottles, a teaspoonful in water every two hours being the prescription. Six days usually exhausts a bottle which are numbered up to five. The entire course of treatment for alcoholism lasts from three to four weeks, that for the opium and morphine habit a week or two longer. The cure is declared to be an utter elimination of the unnatural appetite with which the patient is afflicted. men usually return their bottles of whisky untasted for the first time in three or four days after treatment has begun.
At the hotel in White Plains, where the Keeley patients are lodged, the days pass somewhat monotonously. The men, for the most part, sit around the piazzas and wait for the hours to come when they are to go up the street to the office for hypodermic treatment. Poker and other other games of cards, with stakes, however small, are interdieted, and the patients cautioned against all forms of excitement. If the new arrival for treatment is without power to take care of himself, even under the hope held out to him and the liquor allowed him to "taper off" with, he is placed in charge of an attendant who is himself a "graduate of the in-stitute"—one who has been successfully treated. These attendants, who are never without flasks of alcoholic liquors in their pockets, are, it seemed to the writer, an important part of the
